http://researchspace.auckland.ac.nz

ResearchSpace@Auckland

Copyright Statement

The digital copy of this thesis is protected by the Copyright Act 1994 (New Zealand).

This thesis may be consulted by you, provided you comply with the provisions of the Act and the following conditions of use:

- Any use you make of these documents or images must be for research or private study purposes only, and you may not make them available to any other person.
- Authors control the copyright of their thesis. You will recognise the author's right to be identified as the author of this thesis, and due acknowledgement will be made to the author where appropriate.
- You will obtain the author's permission before publishing any material from their thesis.

To request permissions please use the Feedback form on our webpage. http://researchspace.auckland.ac.nz/feedback

General copyright and disclaimer

In addition to the above conditions, authors give their consent for the digital copy of their work to be used subject to the conditions specified on the Library Thesis Consent Form and Deposit Licence.

Note: Masters Theses

The digital copy of a masters thesis is as submitted for examination and contains no corrections. The print copy, usually available in the University Library, may contain corrections made by hand, which have been requested by the supervisor.
“It’s such a pathetic little operation”: Men, masculinities and vasectomy in New Zealand

Gareth Terry

A thesis submitted in partial fulfilment of the requirement for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in Psychology, The University of Auckland, 2010
Abstract

This thesis examines vasectomy as a gendered practice of (non)reproductive masculinity. Taking the New Zealand context as my domain of focus, I will discuss the socio-cultural meaning of the operation both within Western society, and for individual (heterosexual) men in the ongoing production and reproduction of their identities. This project reports on interview and survey based data, in which a number of New Zealand men made sense of the operation. It is social constructionist in nature, critical realist in orientation and also draws upon poststructuralist feminist theory and critical masculinities theory. This thesis will rely on various forms of quantitative, discourse and thematic analysis to highlight the ways in which men talked about having a vasectomy and its impact on their relationships with their partner, themselves, their own body and others. It will examine the potential use of these in “disrupting and displacing dominant (oppressive) knowledges” (Gavey, 1997, p. 53) and producing inclusive expressions of masculinity, which will have material benefit for women (and men).
Acknowledgements

This thesis, while the product of my own reading, ruminations and really quite awful typing skills, would not have been possible without the influences, time and support of the following people:

The men who shared their experiences of vasectomy with me, their willingness to be open about their sexual and reproductive decision making. Thank you.

My supervisors, Virginia Braun and Nicola Gavey, who both having schedules that defy normal definitions of busyness, still managed to help provide the direction, enhancement and enthusiasm that helped make this thesis possible, all the while not making me feel awful for the disruptions the thesis had to the operating of Feminism and Psychology. Thank you both! Ginny in particular, thanks for keeping me on track when I needed it, giving me slack when I needed that more, and for reminding me time and time again (in the best possible way) that there is always something to improve!

The Gender and Critical Psychology Group (Jeff Adams, Melanie Beres, Nicola Gavey, Jade Le Grice, Sue Cowie, Bernadette Guerin, Virginia Braun and Pani Farvid). Thanks for the questions, insights and for putting up with my cynicism. In particular I would like to thank Melanie, for coffee and conversations, for helping me with the stats, and for introducing me to the ‘delights’ of child friendly cafes (20 children under three!).

Thanks to the Department of Psychology at the University of Auckland for providing me with such great supervisors, an up to date computer and an office space in the Dungeon. Thanks to those in the Department who made the research for, and writing of, this thesis easier. This thesis was also made possible by a University of Auckland Doctoral Scholarship.
My Friends – Special thanks to the Pancake Posse and the Yoga and Pizza Collective: Jody and Miriam for taking my work seriously, Julian for pretending (or at least I hope so!) not to. Thalia who made me put all my ideas into two sentences of layperson’s language even when she understood the jargon. Mike for reminding me to (indirectly) of the need to spell and grammar check and for ‘goodtimes’. For all my friends who have never really got what I do, but love me anyway, put up with my ranting and like to introduce me as a sexologist. Thanks guys!

Brazilian Jiu Jitsu, despite it being particularly inconsistent that a critical masculinities researcher is also a martial artist, I have finally found a sport that makes sense to me (although I’m aware, not to others). Thanks to my coaches and club mates, who often didn’t even try to understand my work, but allowed me an avenue to think about something other than vasectomies, and to burn off calories and stress. Special thanks to the Garage and the Hulk for helping me become a halfway passable blue belt.

My family – you’re mostly all half crazed, but I wouldn’t be where I am (and I quite like where I am) if not for my formative years and all the stuff after that. Thanks especially to Dad, not only for being supportive and taking me as I am, but also for being the first guy I knew of that had had a vasectomy. However that came about, you’d be surprised how much those sorts of decisions have helped shaped me.

Nicola – This thesis would have been impossible without you (as you well know!). Thanks for challenging me, questioning me, agreeing with me, talking with me, listening to me, laughing at me, laughing near me, and encouraging me. For doing the cooking (and washing up!) when I was too stressed to leave the security of the computer. For being the primary breadwinner in our home for over six years. For keeping me sane(ish) and stable...

Chocolate Fish!
Table of Contents

Abstract................................................................................................................................. ii
Acknowledgements.............................................................................................................. iii
List of Tables........................................................................................................................... ix

Chapter 1: To snip or not to snip? Is there even a question? ........................................ 1
  “Ah mate... nuthin’”: How to ‘explain’ the high vasectomy uptake in New Zealand? ....... 3
  Theoretical approach to the thesis...................................................................................... 5
    Social constructionism ................................................................................................. 6
    Critical realism ............................................................................................................ 7
  Aims of the research ........................................................................................................ 9
  Chapter Outline................................................................................................................. 9

Chapter 2: “The psychology of the vasectomised man”: A literature review .......... 12
  Vasectomy research................................................................................................ ........ 12
  Whose tubes to tie? The ‘snip’ versus tubal ligation ..................................................... 13
  The prevalence of vasectomy ......................................................................................... 15
  Side effects studies ................................................................................................ ........ 18
    Prostate Cancer ......................................................................................................... 18
    ‘Erectile dysfunction’ ............................................................................................... 19
    Primary progressive aphasia .................................................................................... 21
    Testicular pain ........................................................................................................... 22
  The ‘psychology of the vasectomised man’: Sex, sex and more sex? ......................... 22
  Regret and the decision making process ....................................................................... 26
  Cutting it short: ‘Childfreedom’, Pre-emptive vasectomies and ‘pathology’ ............... 29
  Non-Western contexts ................................................................................................. 32
  Summary......................................................................................................................... 33

Chapter 3: ‘Let off the hook’: Men, masculinities, privilege and reproduction .......... 34
  Hegemonic and ‘orthodox’ masculinities ................................................................ 35
  Masculinities in the Aotearoa/New Zealand context .............................................. 39
  Masculinities-in-interaction ....................................................................................... 40
  Men, embodiment and privilege of the male body ................................................... 42
    Masculinities and male bodies .................................................................................. 46
    Viagra and privilege of the penis ............................................................................. 49
  Men and Reproduction ............................................................................................... 52
    Economies of obligation and gratitude ..................................................................... 58
    Explaining men’s lack of involvement (in vasectomy) ........................................... 60
  Summary......................................................................................................................... 63

Chapter 4: “Only 20 men? You must be kidding?”: Method to my madness .......... 64
List of Tables

4.1 Demographic information about the men interviewed (‘Typical’ group) 68
4.2 Demographic information about the men interviewed (‘Pre-emptive’ group) 69
4.3 Demographic information about the men interviewed (‘Repeat’ group) 69
5.1 Time since vasectomy operation 84
5.2 Percentage values of the various forms of birth control used by men and their partner 85
5.3 Percentage of men identifying the person who FIRST raised vasectomy as an option to them 86
5.4 Factor Loadings for the ‘Reasons for having a vasectomy’ Scale 89
5.5 Factor Loadings for the ‘Concerns about having a vasectomy’ Scale 93
5.6 Experiences post-vasectomy 96
5.7 Regrets post-vasectomy 97